

Naparsearniaraluarluni naneminit pisarineqarpoq ¹

(Kalaallisut ² for "Tel est pris qui croyait prendre" ³)

(19 September 2026)

The United Kingdom of Denmark, the Land of The People ⁴, and Presocrat XLV and XLII are said to sign forthwith a Treaty of Arctic Military Security.

Worth noting is that at the peak of the Cold War the US was running 17 bases across Greenland with roughly 10,000 troops; today only one, Pituffik Space Base (formerly Thule Air Base), remains somewhat operational, while every other site has been decommissioned over the years, or simply walked away from, including Camp Century, the buried under-ice facility conceived to house up to 600 mobile nuclear missile launchers pointed at the Soviet Union (Project Iceworm), abandoned in 1967 after just six to eight years when the ice proved too unstable to support it. The Army didn't clean up on the way out and some 200,000 liters of diesel fuel, 240,000 liters of sewage, PCBs, and radioactive coolant were simply left entombed under the ice, on the assumption it would stay buried forever (although, as everybody should be well aware of, nothing is ever forever). Of some interest is the fact that the base was abandoned specifically because the ice tunnels were deforming under glacial flow, the Army having given this as the very reason for giving up on Project Iceworm.

¹ A follow-up to Suunngitsumik ulapiissutiginninneq of January 2026

² Kalaallisut is the sole official language of Kalaallit Nunaat (a.k.a. Greenland in English).

³ "And he is caught who thought he'd catch", in Jean de La Fontaine's "Le Rat et l'Huître" (The Rat and the Oyster)

⁴ English for Greenlandic "Kalaallit Nunaat"

It seems the United States never accepted responsibility for the clean-up of the 16 abandoned bases, despite decades of Danish begging.

Historically, the U.S. had established her first Greenlandic base in 1941, and the next sixteen within the next decade or so but all but one were soon abandoned, and by 1992 only one survived.

The reason for the abandonment was probably not that they were indispensable to U.S. overall security, but rather that they were thought on the contrary to be quite useless.

However, should such a large expanse of land ever become independent, it would probably require some party to guarantee her security, since her population density is but 0.1 per square mile, and she would likely beg for the shield of some mighty Angajura or Anira ⁵. Although in a rational world such a benevolent protector would be quite difficult for her to find, free of charge, she finds here a Presocrat ardently willing to oblige, at least for the time being, until the next one eventually loses the taste for it.

The author of these lines is ready to bet that the upcoming Treaty will mandate primarily a strict provision for the clean-up of the 16 abandoned bases, and in particular Camp Century, at the exclusive expense of the United States. In short, some of the abandoned bases, probably not all, will be reenergized, as a flash-back to the 1950s, and, as precondition for the reboot, a probably very expensive cleanup will be mandated, while the dreaded but phantom Asiatic invaders watch in puzzlement.

Naparserniaraluarluni naneminit pisarineqarpoq? ⁶

⁵ "Big brother", depending on whether a male or female calls him

⁶ See Note 3 above